Provenance category	C – The provenance from 1933 to 1945 has not been conclusively clarified; gaps in the ownership history remain. According to current research, there is no evidence of Nazi-looted art. There are, however, implications of Nazi-looted art and / or conspicuous circumstances.
About the provenance	This painting by Salomon van Ruisdael comes from the collection of the Nobel Prize winner and art collector Leopold Ruzicka, from which it was donated to the Kunsthaus Zürich in 2005. By 1935 at the latest, the work was in the collection of the brothers Nathan and Benjamin Katz in the Dutch town of Dieren. In late 1939, to prevent the paintings being seized by the Nazis, the two Jewish art dealers sent some of them to Hanns Schaeffer in New York, who was instructed to sell them on commission on the US market. Schaeffer and the Katz family continued doing business together regularly after the Second World War ended. The painting was not sold in New York and was returned to the Katz company, which was by this time being run by Nathan Katz in Basel; it was from him that Ruzicka acquired it in 1947. It is assumed that in each case, ownership was transferred directly and there are no gaps in the provenance. In the absence of evidence, however, the possibility that it constitutes cultural property confiscated as a result of Nazi persecution cannot currently be ruled out entirely.
