Description	In 1934, the surrealist artist Max Ernst created a large mural for the Mascotte Bar in the Corso building on Bellevue in Zurich. He had received the commission through the mediation of the Zurich architectural historian Sigfried Giedion. When the painting no longer matched the interior of the bar in the late 1950s, it was removed. The monumental painting was detached from the background and transferred to 18 wooden panels, which were then given on loan to the Kunsthause. In 1965, the painting was acquired by the museum with private support. In 2007-2009, the retouching was removed, the surface was cleaned and consolidated once again in preparation for its placement in the Chipperfield building. Here it is not displayed in a museum gallery, but like in its original setting of a bar. Here, the flower heads of the columbine (also called 'aquilegia', in German 'Akelei' or 'Ancolie', a type of flower to which an aphrodisiac effect has been attributed since the Middle Ages) and other animated creatures between animal and plant welcome visitors on their tour of the New Kunsthause to a surrealistic refreshment and enchantment.
